New workforce project to revitalise interest in airport careers

The Australian Airports Association (AAA) has today launched My Airport Career, a workforce initiative focused on promoting the many and varied careers available at airports.

Chief Executive James Goodwin said the My Airport Career website showcases the diversity in careers on offer across the sector.

“Airports are exciting and dynamic places to work, and this initiative aims to help people better understand the opportunities available and how to begin their career path”, Mr Goodwin said.

“The project was born out of research showing many people find it difficult to delineate between airport rather than airline careers within the aviation sector,”

“Domestic and international travel numbers are climbing back to pre-COVID levels but Australian airports are still only operating with about 70 per cent of their required workforce. My Airport Career aims to help change that,”

“It is a portal to communicate the diversity, opportunity, and stability of an airport career, urging people to stay connected about workforce updates and provides airports and with resources they can use in their locally area.”

AAA National Chair, Kym Meys said dedication and passion can lead individuals to excel in the field of aviation, irrespective of their initial entry point in the sector.

“The role of My Airport Career is to become a one-stop destination for anyone seeking to explore the expansive world of airport related careers, providing in-depth insights into various roles at airports,” Ms Meys said.

“The website features a wealth of information, including first-hand accounts from current employees, job profiles at airports and aerodromes, an interactive map to locate the nearest airport or aerodrome, and educational options to kickstart your aviation career.”
